The next section discusses the best equipment for your needs to fulfill the use of a voice over IP (VoIP) gateway in a Cisco VoIP network. In section 4, we will identify the best characteristics of a specific router model. The benefits of the use of a Cisco router in a VoIP network is described in section 3. 1 Introduction A Cisco router is a network device that forwards traffic based on IP addresses and port numbers. The IP address is part of a subnetwork, which the router uses to determine if the incoming traffic needs to be forwarded through the router. The port number is the number assigned to a service. The router forwards the traffic if the incoming traffic is destined for a service that is listening on one of the configured port numbers, and the destination IP address is part of the subnetwork assigned to the router. If the traffic is destined for a service that is not listening, or for a subnetwork that is not assigned to the router, the router discards the traffic. Any IP router, such as a Cisco router, can be used as a gateway for VoIP traffic (VoIP gateway). The routing features of a router allow it to route traffic to and from a VoIP endpoint. Although most customers use a router as a consumer router, there are many types of routers that may be used in a VoIP gateway. As mentioned, we will briefly discuss the use of various routers in a VoIP gateway in this section. One of the most common Cisco router models used for VoIP gateway is the Cisco 3500 series routers. The router has a modular design and includes a platform, a switch, and either a router or a device manager. We will see an example of a Cisco 3550 router in the section "The Cisco 3500 Series." The Cisco 7200 series router is a commonly used router in VoIP gateways. Because the model number is 7200, the router has many variations of one model. The routers discussed in this book use the 7200 router. The Cisco 3150 series router is also an example of a router that may be
